TRUSTED MEDICAL CARE

Being a nurse in the Air Force is more than a profession. It's a rewarding way of life dedicated to providing trusted medical care.

When you become a member of the Air Force Nurse Corps, you'll use your specialized skills to treat a variety of medical conditions and injuries. From caring for our nation's warriors to providing lifesaving disaster relief in humanitarian crises, you'll play a vital role on our healthcare teams.

READINESS

The Air Force Nurse Corps' focus on readiness requires physical fitness, mental resiliency, unique training and partnerships with civilian healthcare systems.

Our nurses must be ready to care for a diverse patient population in all healthcare settings. Air Force medical treatment facilities range from outpatient clinics and major medical centers to deployed mobile units in combat environments and remote locations.

During the COVID-19 pandemic, Air Force nurses served on the front lines battling the virus on military bases as well as in local communities around the globe. In many cases, they were the primary link between patients in isolation and their families. The readiness and training our nurses received played a vital role in efforts to help reduce the spread of the virus.

ROLE MODEL

As a commissioned officer, you'll serve as a role model for enlisted personnel. You'll use your leadership and management skills to inspire and motivate others on your team and your expertise will be relied upon extensively.
